press censorship in Italy is unprecedented. and so complicated a system has been organized at the Home Office to revise press messages dealing with the war that it is a wonder how any information ever gets into the newspapers.

All the telegrams of whatever kind sent from any part of Italy are transmitted to Rome and only allowed to be delivered after the censor has viséd them. For instance, if a tourist at Syracuse wires to a hotel keeper in Switzerland asking him to reserve a double room for himself and his wife the telegram goes first to the Home Office, and if the censor suspects that the meaning of it is dubious or capable of being interpreted differently the tourist and his wife will not find a room reserved.

Naturally enough the correspondents in order to evade the censorship use codes and often wire, for instance, asking for 200 boxes of lemons or announcing the arrival of a ship with 500 tons of coal The censor is on the watch for such messages, which he stops at once as he suspects

In an interesting message attached to his budget estimate for Russia for next year Premier and Finance Minister Kokovtsoff deals with the interaction on all the money markets of the world of events that primarily concern only one or two of them. Russia has been less concerned than any of the other European Powers in the succession of crises that has worried the financial world for the last six months; yet he shows how immediately and seriously she has been affected.

Cheap money had been of great help n developing Russia during the last couple of years. Favorable conditions continued until last July, when the French. dissatisfied with Germany's manner of negotiating on Morocco, withdrew or refused renewal of loans they had placed with German industrial concerns.

This step reacted immediately on all on foreign capital. By September not only French but English, Belgian, Dutch and to some extent Swiss capital was called in from Germany. The rates of foreign exchanges registered the loss. In her turn Germany made her rate and there should be such a splendid riot heavier on countries whose business she helped to finance, such as Russia and

The customs and excise report issued last night seems to suggest that the sobering influence of the famous budget of 1909 is beginning to wane. There has been a distinct increase in the consumption of beer and spirits during the year ended in March last, but the per capita consumption is still less than in any year preceding the budget.

Of whiskey 25,333,000 gallons was consumed, an increase of 4,000,000 gallons on the year before. The total consumption of spirits was 30.880.000 gallons, an increase of almost 5,000,000. The amount of spirits consumed per head of the population has thus risen from slightly over half a gallon to just over two-thirds of a gallon in the year, but before the budget the consumption was nine-tenths of a gallon per head. England is still last in the consumption of spirits, Scotland being first and Ireland second.

The increase in beer drinking was sumption was 26.5 gallons in 1909, 25.9 in 1910 and 26.1 in 1911.
